1.2 Objectives of the Study

The study objective is to carefully explore the factors which play their role in cheque dishonor, to grasp the impacts on the victims, as-well-as, explain the social associations in the Quetta.

2. Literature Review

By studying Canadian officers and how they interacted with each other in their private lives and also conducted business. When there was a case of fraud committed through the use of a cheque, it was considered serious enough to be handled by military courts martial instead of regular courts (Sanusi, 2015). This sometimes meant that people from another country had to come into contact with the personal information belonging to the officer involved; something which could easily bring shame upon him if made public knowledge. Although everyone thought very highly about those who held positions as officers regarding them being honest individuals of great character who could always be trusted especially when it came to money matters, sometimes it happened that someone would write out a bad check intentionally or not know there were insufficient funds available for its payment at the time of signing (Barrett, 2018). To navigate the intricacies of cheque dishonor, one must have a multifaceted understanding that involves legal, financial, and procedural dimensions (Anand, 2001). When a check is dishonored which is a common occurrence during banking transactions, this means for lack of funds by the bank that is supposed to pay or other reasons like account discrepancies (Pattanayak, 2016). Stakes could be high ranging from just financial penalties all the way up to even getting into trouble with law therefore every party needs to know how best they can handle such situations.

The legal system around negotiable instruments such as checks forms the basis upon which cheque dishonor revolves; this framework differs depending on where you are but mostly borrows heavily on laws like Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) from US or Negotiable Instruments Act from India (Dr.B.V.Kapparashetty, 2019). What this implies is that it is very crucial for people dealing in checks to understand their rights as well as those of others like banks and payees. Since financial institutions are in charge of processing and verifying these checks, they have a crucial role to play in handling incidents of dishonored checks. In order to minimize risks and maintain the confidence of their clients, banks must handle dishonored checks in accordance with industry best practices, regulatory regulations, and internal procedures (Kohn, 2003). Strong systems for spotting fraud, keeping an eye on accounts, and confirming funds are some of the essential instruments that must be implemented. These will help to a great extent in averting potential dishonored checks and preserving the integrity of the banking system (Buoni, 2012).

From the perspective of the payee, experiencing a bounced cheque can lead to financial plans being interrupted and trust in business relationships being broken down. It may be necessary to communicate quickly with the drawer and take legal action to recover the debt and claim compensation for any losses incurred (Phalguni Nikam, 2020). If the cheque has been dishonored accidentally or because of special circumstances, talks and mediation can help to maintain the peace and ensure that an agreement is reached. With electronic payment systems and digital banking platforms, technological advancements have brought in new dimensions to cheque dishonor. Electronic fund transfer give both safety and confirmation which enhance the potential also the hurdles (Perritt Jr, 1996). In the digital era, to resolve the issue of cheque fraud a thorough understanding of technology and the issues related to the data security.

2.1 Theoretical Framework

The theoretical framework involves aspects of multiple viewpoints to offer an in-depth comprehension of the relationship amid legal, financial, and socio-economic factors in dishonor of checks. It is essential to examine these theories within the research objectives and critical variables, thus ensuring an extensive examination of dishonor of checks implications in Quetta. Consistent with the qualitative approach utilized in this study including data collected from interviews and analyzed thematically the theoretical framework was constructed so as to ease the process of identifying common themes regarding cheque dishonor and its consequences. Taking cue from the main research questions, this framework looks at the complexity involved in dealing with dishonored cheques within Quetta's banking system, thus shedding light on a widespread understanding of such financial incidents together with their possible effects on individuals, enterprises as well as community at large.

3 Material and Methods

The purpose of this study is to navigate about the Quetta city that which factors distressing cheque dishonor. Based on constructivism a thorough investigation on qualitative approach was created, around how people contract with the Quetta banks who faced cheque dishonor, so their personal experiences and views was investigated in this study. The qualitative approach was selected because of the tendency about giving different perspectives from individual related to the cheque dishonor, also the researcher explores the cultural and economic factors that's affects the people's attitude about the payment of cheques. The theory of constructivism proposes that through by the experiences and interactions individuals build their perception. By taking qualitative research based on constructivism the aim of the study is to give a complete understanding about people dealing with the cheque dishonor. The study attempts to discover how individual react to cheque dishonor grounded on the socio-economic and cultural factors by using thematic analysis and in-depth interviews.

6.1 Limitations

Firstly, the study's sample size was relatively small, with participants coming from a specific geographic area and cultural background. Hence, the results might not be applicable to other settings or communities outside Quetta, Balochistan. To improve the findings' generalizability, future studies should involve a more extensive and diverse sample. Secondly, this research depended on information provided by the respondents during semi-structured interviews. This approach has some inherent limitations, such as social desirability bias and recall bias. Although the researchers tried to minimize these biases through careful interviewing techniques and data analysis, it is essential to note that the subjectivity of the data collection process can influence how we interpret these findings. Moreover, this study primarily concentrated on the analysis of qualitative data which might restrict the understanding of the frequency and prevalence of cheque dishonoring in the society quantitatively. In the future study, using both qualitative and quantitative research methods could give a deeper comprehension of this concept and its consequences. Another limitation of this study is that it did not consider the opinions of the main actors like banks, law-making bodies and those that have specialized in law whose views could be essential in handling the issue of cheque dishonoring in the community. Subsequent research should therefore take into account a wider array of viewpoints in order to come up with sound policies and practical suggestions. Despite these limitations, the research contributes further in understanding the complexities surrounding the bounce of cheques and their consequences in Quetta, Balochistan.
